The first utterance was from a little girl.

She knew not where her mother ast, how far from her or whether she could hear, but between sobs she asked: "Mamma, how can I drown?" None answered her. They awaited the coming of the hour when, separated by the angry waters and tossed between floating timbers they would be carried out to the raging sea which had come over the land. No fond farewells were uttered, no loving embraces and no parting kisses occurred. They feared to intimate one to the other that they helleved the end was so near. Fortunately they all escaped.

In company with Dr. S. O. Young, secretary of the Galveston cotton exchange, a trip was made by a Post representative yesterday afternoon about the city. We visited the wharf, stood upon the top of the buildings, which is the wasf company's office and with a glass swept the line of vision and everywhere we could see nothing but the wreckage of former business buildings. We walked out Tremont street to the heach and found nothing different from what had been told. It was a complete wreck and houses which had once stood upon handsome terracese were either wrecked or disappeared from view aitogether, washed out into the guif. It was the most complete picture of desolation which nature's brush could paint; The stench which came from demolished buildings indicated plainly that all or the bodies have not been recovered.
